As part of the CARES Act, Congress broadly expanded unemployment compensation benefits and allocated substantial federal funds to support state-based Short-Time Compensation (STC) or “work sharing” compensation programs which allow employers to make an agreement with state Unemployment Compensation offices to reduce hours, instead of laying employees off, and then have workers receive partial unemployment compensation benefits for their lost hours in addition to the pay they receive from their employers. The CARES Act also provides nonprofits and government agencies with reimbursement for 50% of the costs they incur (reimbursement) related to unemployment.

The CARES Act provides benefits above and beyond those provided under state unemployment compensation laws. Subject to agreements entered into between states and the federal government, generally, individuals who are unemployed or unable to work due to COVID-19 will be eligible to receive $600 per week in federal assistance in addition to the weekly compensation calculated under state unemployment compensation laws. However, these programs do not benefit those who can work from home with pay or who are receiving sick leave or paid leave benefits.
